Handling Guidelines for Safe Use

Raw frozen diets provide excellent, biologically appropriate nutrition for your pets. However, because these products are highly perishable, proper handling is important as some raw food products may contain bacteria that could cause illness to you or your pets if products are mishandled. For your protection, please follow these instructions for safest use.

- Wash hands before handling raw diets to prevent contaminating the food.
- Keep frozen until ready to use.
- For maximum food safety and freshness, thaw overnight in the refrigerator only the portion you intend to feed the next day. For ideal food safety, products should still be cold to the touch when fed.
- Keep raw meat and poultry separate from other foods. Use hot, soapy water to wash working surfaces, utensils (including cutting boards, preparation areas and feeding bowls), hands, and any other items that touch or come into contact with raw meat or poultry.

- If your pet does not consume all the food presented within 30 minutes, remove any leftovers and discard.
- Use hot, soapy water to wash your pet's bowl after each feeding.
- When collecting your pet's waste products from the yard or litter box, use caution as waste materials may contain bacteria.
